

“When We Go Round In Circles” (A series of pictures taken from now and then)

The mystics say that life in the hereafter is mirrored, or reflected in the life we live here and now. What good is done here and now, is sent up to heaven and then is returned to this existence. Goodness is a round-trip ticket. The good we do now, improves the hereafter, improves the here and now, brings us all closer to life the way God meant it to be. They, the mystics, also believe in the transmigration of the soul. We do not disappear. We are, in a sense, both here and there. We possess and are possessed by a here, a here after, and a here before. We are both clear to ourselves, and not so clear at all. We move throughout the area of now, and then, and ...

This is a series of ‘ghost’ images, photographs that are made, in a sense, while movement carries on, might I suggest, both before and after liveliness. The pictures are meant to reflect the transience of life as well as the sense of our having been, even though we are now, our transcendence.
